ALI Council Approves All or Part of Six Project Drafts at October Meeting

At its meetings on October 13 and October 22-23, 2020, the Council reviewed and discussed Council Drafts of seven projects and approved drafts and portions of drafts as listed below. All approvals are subject to the discussion at the meeting and the usual editorial prerogative.

The next ALI Council Meeting will be held via Zoom on January 21-22, 2021.

Children and the Law

The Council approved Council Draft No. 6, containing § 1.60 from Chapter 1, Parental Authority and Responsibilities; § 2.60 from Chapter 2, State Intervention for Abuse and Neglect; §§ 9.10 and 9.20 from Chapter 9, Religion in Public Schools; §§ 12.10 and 12.11 from Chapter 12, Pre-Adjudication; and §§ 14.20 and 14.21 from Chapter 14, Delinquency Dispositions.

Compliance, Risk Management, and Enforcement

The Council approved §§ 6.01-6.20 of Chapter 6 of Council Draft No. 4, which included principles common to enforcement by criminal prosecutors and civil enforcement officials, as well as criminal enforcement policy for misconduct by organizations. The approval excludes new material on joint defense agreements to be drafted by the Reporters in accordance with the discussion at the meeting and included in the next Council Draft.

The Council also discussed Chapter 4, Compliance Risk Management, but no vote was taken. The Reporters will revise the Chapter in accordance with the discussion for the Council's consideration in January 2021.

THE DIRECTOR'S LETTER BY

The American Law Institute and the U.S. Supreme Court, Revisited

In my Winter 2016 Director's Letter, I looked at the U.S. Supreme Court's use of ALI materials during the 2013 to 2015 Terms, as part of an effort to examine how the ALI's influence extends beyond the state courts and affects the development of federal law. Now that four years have passed since my last analysis of the Supreme Court's use of ALI materials and several new Justices have joined the Court, revisiting this topic seems worthwhile.

During the 2016 to 2019 Terms, the Supreme Court cited ALI publications in 51 separate opinions across 42 argued cases—roughly 15 percent of the total number of cases argued. (This proportion is comparable to the 16 percent of argued cases citing ALI publications during the 2013 to 2015 Terms.) Thirty-one of these 51 opinions were majorities, 17 were dissents, and three were concurrences. Eleven opinions relied on more than one ALI publication. Justice Sotomayor was the most frequent author of opinions citing ALI publications, with 10 opinions, followed by Justice Thomas and Justice Breyer with eight each, Justice Alito with seven, and Justice Ginsburg and Justice Gorsuch with five each. Every Justice cited the ALI's work at least once.

Since 2016, Torts is the field of ALI work that the Court has cited most frequently, with 17 opinions: three citing the original Restatement, 10 the Restatement Second, two the Restatement Third, Torts: Products Liability, and two the Restatement Third, Torts: Liability for Physical and Emotional Harm. Next, there are nine opinions citing the Model Penal Code and nine opinions citing the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United

Conflict of Laws

The Council discussed §§ 6.01, 6.05, and 6.10 of Council Draft No. 4, which contained Topic 1, General Rules, of Chapter 6 on Torts, but no approval vote was taken. Working with a small group of Council members, the Reporters will explore (i) reformulating the system set out in the black letter using a general rule of place of conduct with exceptions for common domicile and split domicile, and (ii) moving the description of the distinction between conduct-regulating issues (territorial connecting factors) and loss-regulating issues (personal connecting factors) to the commentary.

Government Ethics

The Council approved Council Draft No. 6 containing §§ 501(d), 514, and 515 from Chapter 5, Revolving-Door Restrictions, and all of Chapter 6, Disclosure, subject to review of a revised draft of Chapter 6 by a small group of Council members.

Property

The Council approved Council Draft No. 3, which contained Chapters 1-5 of Division One, The Estate System, of Volume 4 (Divided and Shared Ownership), and Chapters 4-7 of Division One, Zoning, of Volume 7 (Land Use).

Student Sexual Misconduct: Procedural Frameworks for Colleges and Universities

The Council approved §§ 6.8-6.10 of Chapter 6, Formal Resolution of Sexual-Misconduct Complaints, of Council Draft No. 4. The Council also discussed but did not vote on whether to approve § 6.7, which the Reporters will revise in accordance with the discussion. There was insufficient time to discuss the remainder of the draft.

Torts: Concluding Provisions

The Council approved §§ 1-3 of Chapter 11, Liability of Medical Professionals and Institutions, in Council Draft No. 1, excluding Illustrations 5-8 in § 2. The Reporters may revise the excluded Illustrations in a future draft. There was insufficient time to discuss the remainder of the Council Draft.

Members interested in any of these projects can access drafts in the Projects section of the ALI website. Those who join a Members Consultative Group will be alerted when future meetings are scheduled and when drafts are available online.

States, with three citing the Restatement Fourth of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (including two citations to a Tentative Draft), five the Restatement Third, and one the Restatement Second.

Not surprisingly, several of the citations are to Restatements involving federal law. For example, in United States Patent & Trademark Office v. Booking.com, which sadly turned out to be her final majority opinion for the Court, Justice Ginsburg cited § 15 of the Restatement Third of Unfair Competition in holding that Booking.com is not a generic term ineligible for trademark registration under the Lanham Act. And in Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela v. Helmerich & Payne International Drilling Company, the Court considered whether a nonfrivolous, but ultimately unsuccessful, claim that property was taken in violation of international law is sufficient to confer jurisdiction under the expropriation exception to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976. The Court relied on the Restatement Third of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States and a Tentative Draft of the Restatement Fourth in holding that the claim must be valid, not merely nonfrivolous. In addition, the Supreme Court also considered other types of ALI projects dealing with federal law, such as the ALI's 1969 Study of the Division of Jurisdiction Between State and Federal Courts and the 2004 Federal Judicial Code Revision Project.

The Supreme Court has also looked to our Restatements of state common law, as well as the Model Penal Code, for guidance on a range of constitutional, procedural, and statutory issues arising under federal law. On the constitutional front, for example, the Court relied on the Restatement Third of Trusts in North Carolina Department of Revenue v. The Kimberley Rice Kaestner 1992 Family Trust in holding that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limits a state's ability to tax in-state beneficiaries of a trust who have no right to demand trust income and are uncertain to receive it. With respect to procedural matters, in McDonough v. Smith the Court held that the statute of limitations for a fabricated-evidence claim under § 1983 begins to run only when the defendant is acquitted, not when the fabricated evidence is used. In that case, the Court cited our Restatement Second of Torts in drawing an analogy between the fabricated-evidence claim and the common-law tort of malicious prosecution. And in the statutory field, both our Restatements and Model Penal Code have been helpful for ascertaining the elements of predicate offenses like burglary referenced in statutes such as the Armed Career Criminal Act, which is a frequent issue before the Supreme Court given that the definitions of these offenses often vary among the states.

My Winter 2016 Director's Letter also addressed criticism of the ALI's work made by Justice Scalia in a 2015 partial concurrence and partial dissent in Kansas v. Nebraska. Justice Scalia claimed that the newer Restatements do not accurately describe the law as it is but instead reflect the Reporters' own normative vision of what the law should be. He warned that "it cannot safely be assumed, without further inquiry, that a Restatement provision describes rather than revises current law." This issue came up again this past June when Justice Thomas wrote a dissenting opinion in Liu v. SEC that quoted Justice Scalia's criticism in discussing the Restatement Third of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment.

I agree that it is vital that our Restatements accurately describe the law. Even before Justice Scalia's criticisms, we added a provision to our Style Manual requiring that a Restatement adopting a minority position "should say so explicitly and explain why." The ALI, the Style Manual adds, "needs to be clear about what it is doing." Such clarity makes it as easy as possible for busy judges and other readers who wish to make "further inquiry" into the case law underlying our Restatements to do so.

I like to think that it is at least in part because we have heightened our transparency and made it crystal clear where the Restatement adopts a minority or new position not well embedded in the prevailing law that both Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas continued to rely on our work. As I pointed out in my Winter 2016 Director's Letter, Justice Scalia was the member of the Court who most cited the ALI's work during the 2013-2015 Terms, and he cited the newer Restatements as well as the older ones around the time of his opinion in Kansas v. Nebraska. As indicated above, Justice Thomas is also one of the Justices who most uses our work. And while he has cited many of our older Restatements, he has also made use of our newer Restatements, too. In fact, he became only the second Justice to cite to the Fourth series when he quoted a Tentative Draft of the Restatement Fourth of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States in his dissent in Upper Skagit Indian Tribe v. Lundgren in 2018.

It is gratifying to see the Supreme Court use our publications in so many ways. The trust the Justices repose in our work is to be earned and safeguarded. We should continue to be very proud of our work!

Project Spotlight: Restatement of the Law Third, Torts: Remedies

This fall, the first draft was produced and the first project meeting was held for the Torts: Remedies project. This project was launched along with two other Torts projects, Defamation and Privacy and Concluding Provisions, which once complete will be part of the nine-book collection* that will be the entirety of the Restatement of the Law Third, Torts.

Once approved by the ALI Council and membership, this project will supersede the remedies Sections of Restatement Second, Torts. The Restatement Second recognized compensatory damages, injunctions, and other remedies as appropriate in particular cases. The Restatement Third reorganizes, consolidates, and expands the Restatement Second's discussion of remedies.

Preliminary Draft No. 1, § 1 is titled “Introduction: The Right to a Remedy.” This Section is much like an index section, providing a preview of what is to come in this project. Project participants will recognize the following as excerpted from the Comments of § 1. These provide a broad overview of this project, and serve as a roadmap for any members who wish to join the project now.

If you are curious about all of the proposed Sections, the Preliminary Draft contains a projected table of contents for the entire project. Project Reporters Douglas Laycock and Richard Hasen note that, “The higher the proposed Section number, the more preliminary that table is. We think that the basic structure is sound and that any structural changes will be modest.”

Most of Chapter 1: Compensatory Damages; Topic 1. General Rules for Measuring Compensatory Damages was presented at the first project meeting.

Now is the perfect time for interested members to join the Members Consultative Group (MCG). MCG participants will be alerted when future meetings are scheduled and when drafts are available.

This Restatement puts liability issues to one side, assuming that plaintiff can prove defendant's liability (or, in the case of preliminary injunctive relief, likelihood of liability). Similarly, this Restatement does not take a position on the question of whether a jurisdiction should recognize specific torts discussed in this Restatement, but considers only the appropriate remedy and the scope or measure of that remedy if the jurisdiction recognizes a specific tort. Illustrations describe conduct that causes or threatens harm and creates the need for a remedy, and the Illustrations assume that the conduct described is tortious. Often the tort will be obvious. But when the assumed tort is not obvious, this Restatement takes no position on whether the conduct is or should be a tort. Other parts of the Restatement Third, Torts, consider the standards for liability.

It is common to speak of liability rules as “substantive” when contrasting liability rules with remedial rules. This casual usage rarely causes any serious confusion, but it is not accurate, because the law of remedies is also substantive. Except for a few details in the law of preliminary relief, remedies law is no part of the procedural rules by which disputes are litigated. What and how much a plaintiff recovers is part of the plaintiff's substantive entitlement and not simply a rule for processing disputes. The law of remedies determines the practical extent of plaintiff's rights and of defendant's liabilities, and a plaintiff's rights under liability rules are meaningless without effective remedies. As many cross-references in this Restatement may suggest, the line between remedies law and the rest of the substantive law is often unclear or disputed. When it is necessary to distinguish remedies law from the rest of the substantive law, this Restatement will refer to liability rules, the law governing liability, or similar formulations.

The most common tort remedy is compensatory damages. Given their frequent use in tort litigation, compensatory damages take up a major portion of this Restatement. Compensatory damages are the dominant remedy in tort because torts often occur suddenly (as with most personal injuries), or they proceed in secret before the potential plaintiff discovers what has happened (as with most frauds and latent injuries from harmful substances). Either way, a potential plaintiff often lacks sufficient warning to obtain an injunction before the tort occurs. But when a tort is continuing or repeated, or in other circumstances in which a threatened tort can be anticipated, an injunction against the defendant is an important remedy. And some torts can be reversed, as when converted or misappropriated property is returned to its owner in replevin or pursuant to an injunction.

Many torts are profitless to the defendant, and without some benefit to the defendant, restitutionary remedies are inapplicable. Punitive damages are exceptional, aimed principally at punishment and deterrence. The remaining tort remedies are specialized, or beneficial to a plaintiff only in limited situations. These various limitations leave compensatory damages as by far the most common and most important tort remedy.

Although compensatory damages are the most common remedy in tort, this Restatement also considers other appropriate remedies for tort liability.

Injunctive relief seeks to prevent future harm, including the continuing effects of a tort committed in the past. Courts enforce injunctions through the contempt power, which is used to coerce defendant's behavior or compensate plaintiff for violations of the injunction. Declaratory judgments declare the rights and responsibilities of the parties. Declaratory judgments are implicitly coercive, because the court can follow through with an injunction if necessary.

Nominal damages are awarded to vindicate a right without regard to actual damages; they function like a declaratory judgment with respect to past events. Punitive damages award more than the sum needed to restore tort victims to their rightful position (see § 2); they are designed to punish wrongdoing and to provide greater deterrence than compensatory damages alone.

Restitutionary remedies are generally measured by an intentional tortfeasor's unjust enrichment from the wrong. These remedies are attractive to a plaintiff when the defendant's provable profits exceed the plaintiff's provable damages, or when the plaintiff has a restitutionary claim to recover specific property. A plaintiff generally seeks restitution of a defendant's profits only in these circumstances, with the result that when restitutionary remedies are available, they often award more than the recovery available or collectible as compensatory damages. The principal goal of these restitutionary remedies is to ensure that conscious wrongdoers do not profit from their wrongs. Restitutionary claims to specific property are generally administered through equitable remedies such as constructive trust or equitable lien, which give the successful plaintiff a priority in bankruptcy.

Courts may award some remedies, such as punitive damages, in addition to compensatory damages; neither the purpose nor the measure of punitive damages duplicates the purpose or measure of compensatory damages. Other remedies may be duplicative of or inconsistent with compensatory damages. An award of nominal damages is duplicative of an award of compensatory damages for the same tort, and its declaratory purpose is fully served by the award of compensatory damages. Similarly, it would be improperly duplicative for a court both to enjoin future tortious conduct and also to compensate plaintiff with compensatory damages for expected losses from the threatened tortious conduct that is now enjoined.

Compensatory damages are substitutionary; they offer a sum of money as a substitute for plaintiff's true rightful position, a position in which the plaintiff had not been injured in the first place. Specific remedies also aim to restore plaintiffs to their rightful position, or to preserve threatened plaintiffs in that position by preventing the tort. These remedies seek to restore or preserve the rightful position in kind, rather than with an equivalent sum of money. These specific remedies include injunctions against threatened or continuing torts, injunctions to undo or repair the consequences of a tort, restoration of specific property, declaratory judgments, and constructive trusts and other specific restitutionary remedies.

Some courts and commentators refer to the award of a wrongdoer's profits in restitution as “damages,” or as an alternate measure of damages. But that usage is both inaccurate and confusing and will never appear in this Restatement. The award of a wrongdoer's profits, or any other restitutionary remedy, is fundamentally different from compensatory damages. In some forms, such as disgorgement, restitution is an alternate monetary remedy, but it is not an alternate measure of the plaintiff's damages. Some restitutionary relief is specific (and traditionally available from courts of equity), and results in the plaintiff obtaining an interest in property to which defendant holds title, such as through a constructive trust.

Unlike compensatory damages, the award of punitive damages is not a measure of the plaintiff's rightful position. But the term “damages” is not confusing in this context, in part because it is so familiar and well understood, and in part because speakers and writers who mean punitive damages never use the word “damages” without the modifier “punitive.”

Because remedies issues arise only if the injured person chooses to sue, after the parties are in court and generally after liability has been established, this Restatement will generally refer to “plaintiff” and “defendant” rather than to “an actor” and similar formulations common in many other Restatements.

Getting to Know ALI in 2020: New Members Attend Their First Project Meetings Held Virtually

The quality of the Institute's work is rooted in the gathering of its members for unfettered discussions on the most pressing legal issues of the day. ALI prides itself on the quality, depth, and civility of its project-meeting discussions, and cherishes the opportunity to bring together today's best legal minds to carry on scholarly and scientific legal work and help clarify and simplify the law.

This fall brought a new venture for the Institute, marking the completion of the first virtual-only season of project meetings. While the work of the Institute moved forward with great success, the camaraderie built in person is greatly missed.

Lydia Kay Griggsby was appointed Judge of the United States Court of Federal Claims in 2014. Prior to her appointment, she served as the Chief Counsel for Privacy and Information Policy for the Senate Judiciary Committee. In 2004, Judge Griggsby was appointed counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Ethics. She served six years as an Assistant U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia from 1998 to 2004. Between 1995 and 1998, Judge Griggsby was a trial attorney with the Civil Division of the United States Department of Justice, where she litigated complex civil matters before the United States Court of Federal Claims and the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. Prior to her appointment to the Department of Justice, Judge Griggsby was an associate at DLA Piper.

You attended your first ALI project meeting as a Members Consultative Group participant for Principles of the Law, Government Ethics, which took place remotely as a result of the pandemic. Although a remote project meeting cannot fully replace the experience of an in-person meeting, what did you take away from your first experience as a participant on an ALI project?

I very much enjoyed my first ALI project meeting. I was struck by the diversity of the views expressed and the experiences of the members of the consultative groups. I was very pleased to see that all views expressed during the meeting were valued and considered by the participants. Having worked on legislative ethics issues earlier in my legal career, I also appreciated the opportunity to share my own experiences.

As an ALI member joining the Institute during this unique time, what ALI experience are you most looking forward to when things return to normal?

I am looking forward to attending my first Annual Meeting as an ALI member. I have attended many Annual Meetings before, but my first meeting as a member will be very special.

In this piece, we celebrate some of our newest members (July 2020 Class). Although they joined the Institute at such a unique time, they demonstrate the dedication to its mission, even in these unprecedented circumstances. Here they share their experiences adapting to a remote environment and thoughts on what it was like to attend their first ALI project meetings virtually.

What has been the most challenging experience adapting your work to a remote or hybrid environment? What have you learned that will change the way you work going forward?

Because the Court of Federal Claims has nationwide jurisdiction, I am accustomed to conducting some court proceedings remotely. But, conducting all oral arguments and trials remotely is quite challenging. I have learned that I can be very productive working from home, and I plan to incorporate telework into my work routine going forward.

As we close out 2020, what are you doing to stay connected to friends and family?

Lots of Zoom calls with family and friends. I text my godchildren daily to keep in touch.

Nadia N. Sawicki is a Georgia Reithal Professor of Law at Loyola University Chicago School of Law and Co-Director of Loyola's Beazley Institute for Health Law and Policy. Her areas of expertise are torts, health law, and bioethics. Professor Sawicki's research addresses issues at the intersection of these three fields, and she has published widely on subjects including law's role in shaping the informed-consent process; the challenges of protecting patients' rights to effective medical care while also accommodating health-care providers' conscientious beliefs; tort law's limitations in protecting the rights of patients making end-of-life decisions; and the state's role in enforcing ethical norms in medicine.

You attended two remote fall project meetings as a Members Consultative Group participant, Restatement Third of Torts: Intentional Torts to Persons and Restatement Third of Torts: Remedies. What did you take away from your experience as a remote participant on an ALI project?

I am lucky to have had the opportunity to experience these two remote meetings after having participated in one meeting in person. I traveled to Philadelphia for my first ALI meeting in early March, just days before the COVID-19 lockdown began, to serve as an Adviser on Torts: Concluding Provisions. That first experience was so inspiring, and I was thrilled to be able to continue working on the Restatement after being elected as an ALI member. The remote meetings I attended this fall really did capture so much of the in-person experience. I have been impressed by my colleagues' ability to navigate this unique environment without losing any of the rigor, debate, and collegiality at the heart of the ALI experience.

What ALI experience are you most looking forward to when things return to normal?

I am eager to attend my first ALI Annual Meeting, and I'm hopeful that we will all be able to travel to Washington, DC next May.

What has been the most challenging experience adapting your work to a remote or hybrid environment?

As a professor, the most challenging part of the transition to remote teaching has been learning how to connect with my students in a virtual environment. I have 73 first-year students in my Torts class, and their only experience of law school has been in front of a screen. Finding new ways to engage with them—both within the classroom and via informal opportunities like office hours and coffee talks—has been a learning process. Honestly, I think this experience has made me a better teacher, because it's made me rethink my traditional pedagogical practices and take a more innovative and creative approach.

As we close out 2020, what are you doing to stay connected to friends and family?

My parents, siblings, nieces, and nephews all live far from me, so video chats have been essential in keeping us connected. Here in Chicago, I'm still able to connect with a few of my closest friends in person. I have a large backyard with a fire pit, and once a week my husband and I invite someone to sit around the fire with us (at a distance), and imagine we're living in easier times.

Peter K. Yu is Regents Professor of Law and Communication and Director of the Center for Law and Intellectual Property at Texas A&M University. Born and raised in Hong Kong, Professor Yu is a leading expert in international intellectual property and communications law. He also writes and lectures extensively on international trade, international and comparative law, and the transition of the legal systems in China and Hong Kong. He is Vice-President and Co-Director of Studies of the American Branch of the International Law Association and has served as the general editor of The WIPO Journal published by the World Intellectual Property Organization.

You attended two fall project meetings as a Members Consultative Group participant, Principles for a Data Economy and Restatement of the Law, Copyright. What did you take away from your first experience as a participant on an ALI project?

I was keenly aware of how seriously ALI members take Institute projects, and I have seen the quality of Restatements and Principles, but nothing compares to seeing firsthand how the Reporters, Advisers, and other members work behind the scenes. Even on the rare occasions when strong disagreements arise, members work collegially and collaboratively to make sure that the work product best reflects the law and its current developments.

What ALI experience are you most looking forward to when things return to normal?

Meeting other ALI members face-to-face. The Institute includes a lot of luminaries in the legal field—whether at the bench, at the bar, or in academia. I am especially eager to participate in Institute projects that will teach me new insights and perspectives and that will allow me to develop a more holistic view of the legal system.

What has been the most challenging experience adapting your work to a remote or hybrid environment?

I have never been a big fan of online meetings. Compared with physical gatherings, I find these meetings not as conducive to collecting information and knowledge that I have not planned to solicit in advance. Before the pandemic, we tended to overlook the large amount of information that gets communicated, often spontaneously, through social gatherings and physical interactions. Even a handshake or a hug could tell us a lot.

As a longtime Lakers fan, you have witnessed a good amount of championship seasons. Does this year's championship feel different?

I am amazed you found that out. I have been supporting the Lakers since the late 1980s and have been a basketball referee at the University of Wisconsin. This year's championship felt different because of the lack of live fans and home-court advantage. As viewers, we also went into the postseason with very different expectations—not that different from resuming practice or teaching after a lockdown. But all in all, I am very happy that the Lakers finally have as many championships as that other team.

As we close out 2020, what are you doing to stay connected to friends and family?

What I do will depend on the number of confirmed COVID cases in my area, but this winter I most likely will stay home to connect with friends and family through virtual means. Technology has made it easy to communicate without face-to-face contact, and the last few months have transformed even technophobes into regular users. I do plan to use this winter to start making plans to visit friends and family after the pandemic—in the not too distant future, I hope.

ALI to Celebrate its New Life Members: the Class of 1996

In May, The American Law Institute will welcome a new class of Life Members—the Class of 1996. Each year, ALI members who have contributed 25 years of service to the Institute are granted Life Member status. Life Members are no longer required to pay dues or adhere to the Institute’s participation requirement, but they continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges of elected membership.

The Class of 1996 will be honored at a special celebration to honor our new Life Members and 50-Year Members. While this event was originally intended to be a luncheon held during the 2021 Annual Meeting, we are currently exploring virtual alternatives should we be unable to hold the celebration in person. New Life Members are given the opportunity to commemorate this quarter-century milestone by contributing to the 1996 Life Member Class Gift, which will be presented to the Institute by the 1996 Life Member Class Gift Committee during the event. The 1996 Life Member Class Gift campaign will be chaired by William C. Hubbard of University of South Carolina School of Law.

Now in its 10th year, the Class Gift program has raised more than $1.3 million to support key aspects of ALI’s mission, including the MCG Travel Assistance program and the Judges and Public-Sector Lawyers Expense Reimbursement program—two vital components of the Institute’s efforts to minimize financial barriers to member participation.

The Class Gift initiative also provides funding for the Early Career Scholars Medal and annual conference program, which raises awareness of the Institute’s work while engaging up-and-coming legal academics. Additionally, as ALI continues to expand the breadth of its law-reform endeavors, the Class Gift program helps cover some of the costs associated with maintaining the high level of quality that distinguishes the Institute’s work.

The 1996 Life Member Class Gift campaign is now underway. For more information about the campaign, please contact Senior Development Manager Kyle Jakob at 215-243-1660 or kjakob@ali.org. Or, to learn about ALI’s other ongoing fundraising initiatives, please visit www.ali.org/support.

Principles of the Law, Data Privacy

Principles of the Law, Data Privacy, is The American Law Institute's first venture into the field of information privacy law. This project identifies core principles useful for bringing greater coherence to this area. Like all Principles projects, it seeks to provide best practices for institutions other than the courts—in this case entities that collect personal information and the legislatures and administrative agencies, state and federal, that regulate them.

Reporters Paul M. Schwartz of the University of California, Berkeley School of Law, and Daniel J. Solove of George Washington University Law School completed this project at a time when guidance on data privacy is more necessary than ever. High-profile scandals—such as the hacking of sensitive data from the credit-reporting agency Equifax and Cambridge Analytica's abuse of misappropriated personal data during the 2016 presidential election—underscore the dangers for individuals, who are often unaware that their personal information is being collected in the first place, as well as pitfalls facing businesses and organizations reliant on such data. In response to such events, states have passed privacy legislation and Congress has been considering several bills that would provide greater protection for personal data privacy, including proposals to overhaul the Federal Trade Commission or to create a new Data Protection Agency.

The global COVID-19 pandemic has given these important questions even greater urgency. Governments and public-health officials around the world have turned to digital data to track and seek to contain the spread of the virus. Many countries are employing digital contact tracing, which uses personal data collected from mobile devices or credit cards to identify anyone who was in contact with an infected individual. Even traditional tools, like temperature checks at workplaces and health surveys for travelers, involve the collection, use, and disclosure of personal information. But while personal data offers promising avenues for limiting the spread of the virus and resuming economic activity, measures like digital contact tracing have elicited strong opposition from privacy advocates, who worry that these developments endanger civil liberties and give too much power to governments and technology companies.

These Principles will be of use in addressing the difficult questions raised by the pervasive use of personal data, including vital questions of public health, as well as financial and personal safety of individuals.

Trial Manual 6 with 2020 Supplement

The electronic versions of the 2020 Supplement to the sixth edition of the Trial Manual for the Defense of Criminal Cases (2016) and the Trial Manual 6 with the 2020 Supplement incorporated are now available for download. Attorneys in public-defender offices and in nonprofit legal-services organizations that do criminal-defense work can apply for a free electronic copy by visiting www.ali.org/trial-manual. A print version of the 2020 Supplement is forthcoming.

Authored by Anthony G. Amsterdam and Randy Hertz of NYU School of Law, the Trial Manual is designed as a how-to-do-it exposition for the general practitioner of the law and practice of criminal defense. It gives the lawyer who is relatively inexperienced in criminal proceedings a compact guide through the stages of a criminal case, from arrest and investigation to appeal. It identifies critical points in the proceedings, warns of rights to be asserted and interests to be protected at each stage, describes the practices and procedures necessary or useful for the assertion of those rights and the protections of those interests, and, in both narrative and checklist form, suggests steps to be taken or considered by defense counsel at the various stages.

The book is organized for easy access by both experienced practitioners and those just starting out in practice. It enables both to locate quickly the legal and practical materials needed to jump-start their work at any given stage. It is an invaluable resource for those who are called upon to defend an individual in a criminal case.

ATTORNEYS IN PUBLIC-DEFENDER OFFICES AND IN NONPROFIT LEGAL-SERVICES ORGANIZATIONS THAT DO CRIMINAL-DEFENSE WORK CAN APPLY FOR A FREE ELECTRONIC COPY BY VISITING WWW.ALI.ORG/TRIAL-MANUAL.

ALI CLE Courses on ALI Restatement Projects

ALI project participants and Reporters recently contributed even more of their time to create CLE courses on topics addressed in two Restatement projects: Children and the Law, and the U.S. Law of International Commercial and Investor–State Arbitration. These courses are available through ALI-CLE.org.

In Children and the Law: Protecting the Vulnerable in a Time of Crisis, Restatement of Children and the Law Reporters Elizabeth Scott and Clare Huntington, along with project participants Kristin Henning and Marsha Levick, focus on child welfare and juvenile justice issues and how these issues are made even more complicated in the time of COVID. They break down different portions of the Restatement in detail to address how the law defines parental authority and responsibility, what Constitutional challenges youth encounter during a pandemic, and much more. This course is being made available for free to legal-services and child-advocacy organizations across the country; contact communications@ali.org for more information.

In Ethics Issues Implicated in the Restatement of the U.S. Law of International Commercial and Investor–State Arbitration, Reporters George A. Bermann, Catherine A. Rogers, Jack J. Coe, Jr., and Christopher R. Drahozal explore how ethical considerations manifested themselves in the course of the project and how they manifest themselves in the operation of international arbitration, particularly in U.S. courts. Topics addressed include arbitrator procedural power and attorney–client privilege, arbitrator immunity, counsel conduct and arbitrator authority to disqualify, and ethics and public policy. This ethics CLE course will be available as a live program in early 2021.

The Institute in the Courts: Idaho Supreme Court Relies on Restatement Third of Property (Wills and Other Donative Transfers) and Restatement Third of Trusts

In Ferguson v. Ferguson, 473 P.3d 363 (Idaho 2020), the Supreme Court of Idaho relied on the Restatement of the Law Third, Property (Wills and Other Donative Transfers), and the Restatement of the Law Third, Trusts, in holding, as a matter of first impression, that no-contest provisions were generally enforceable in Idaho trust instruments, subject to various common-law limitations.

In that case, the petitioner was originally excluded as a beneficiary of his parents' trust ("Original Trust") but, after his father's death, his mother, through her will, exercised a power of appointment granted to her in the Original Trust to name the petitioner as a beneficiary of one of the three sub-trusts of the Original Trust ("Survivor's Trust"), which was made up of his mother's separate property and any interest of the community property held in the Original Trust upon his father's death. After his mother's death, the petitioner filed a petition in Idaho state court against his three siblings and his parents' long-time accountant, who were successor trustees of the trusts, seeking financial records from the sub-trusts and the Original Trust to determine whether he would receive his full share of the Survivor's Trust. The successor trustees responded by providing an inventory and interim accounting of the Survivor's Trust but refusing to provide any information or accounting from before the mother's death. While this matter was pending, the petitioner filed a claim in Arizona probate court against his mother's estate, alleging that he was "a creditor of her estate because [his mother], as trustee of the Survivor's Trust, breached various fiduciary duties owed to him." After the petitioner's three siblings, acting this time as co-personal representatives of the mother's estate, disallowed his claim, the petitioner filed a Petition for Allowance of Claim and for Stay in the probate court, seeking "to preserve his rights from being barred by the statute of limitations while his entitlement to the Trust's financial records was litigated" in this case.

The magistrate court in the Idaho proceedings denied in part and granted in part the successor trustees' motion for summary judgment to enforce the forfeiture provision in the Original Trust, finding that the petitioner's Arizona petition "did not trigger the forfeiture provision because it was attempting to ascertain the full extent of [the petitioner's] interest rather than contest the validity of the Original Trust," but that the petitioner "did not become a beneficiary of the Survivor's Trust until after [his mother's] death, and as such, he was not entitled to any Survivor's Trust records from before [his mother's] death." Reversing in part, the state district court held that, while the petitioner became a beneficiary of the Survivor's Trust when his mother exercised the power of appointment in her will, he forfeited his interest in the Survivor's Trust because he lacked probable cause to bring his Arizona petition. The state court reasoned that the mother did not owe the petitioner any fiduciary duties and that "it would not be reasonable for [him] to conclude he was entitled to an accounting from before [her] death or that she breached any fiduciary duties," because she was the sole trustee of the Survivor's Trust, which granted her broad discretion to distribute and use its principal during her lifetime for "any reason."

Reversing and remanding to the district court with instructions to remand to the magistrate court, the Supreme Court of Idaho "adopt[ed] the majority position identified in the Restatement [of the Law Third, Trusts § 96, Comment e]," and held, inter alia, "that no-contest provisions are generally enforceable in Idaho trust instruments" but "their enforceability is subject to various common law limitations." Relying on § 96, Comment e, the court reasoned that no-contest clauses were valid and generally enforceable in most jurisdictions. Additionally, citing Restatement of the Law Third, Property (Wills and Other Donative Transfers) § 8.5, Comment i, the court noted that "the same rules and principles logically apply to trusts" as they do to wills, and Idaho had "codified common law limitations on the enforceability of no-contest provisions in wills when it adopted the Uniform Probate Code." The court observed that, under § 8.5, and Comments b and c thereto, "no-contest provisions [were] enforceable 'unless probable cause existed for instituting the proceedings.'" Furthermore, "[n]o-contest provisions 'shall not be enforced to the extent that doing so would interfere with the enforcement or proper administration of the trust,'" (quoting Restatement of the Law Third, Trusts § 96(2)), and that "[t]he mere filing of a paper that is 'intended solely to procure time to ascertain the facts upon which the decision to institute a proceeding must rest should not be construed to constitute the institution of an action to contest,'" (quoting Restatement of the Law Third, Property (Wills and Other Donative Transfers) § 8.5, Comment d).

The court determined that the district court erred in enforcing the forfeiture provision against the petitioner before first addressing whether the trustees breached their fiduciary duties in administering the Survivor's Trust. The court explained that the trustees sought to apply the forfeiture provision to remove the petitioner as a beneficiary because he requested records relating to the manner in which the Survivor's Trust had been administered, and "[s]uch a result [was] inconsistent with the proper administration of the Survivor's Trust under Idaho law, and interfere[d] with [the petitioner's] rights as a beneficiary in the Survivor's Trust." The court rejected the trustees' argument that the forfeiture provision could not interfere with the trust administration because the petitioner was not entitled to the records, given that the mother did not owe the petitioner any fiduciary duties. The court clarified that, while the mother had "virtually unlimited discretion" in using the trust assets, she did owe some limited duties to the petitioner under Restatement of the Law Third, Trusts §§ 50 and 76, and her discretion "ha[d] no bearing on the Successor Trustees' current fiduciary duties" to the trust's beneficiaries. In examining the trustees' argument that the forfeiture provision was enforceable because the petitioner lacked probable cause in filing his creditor's claim, the court explained that "Idaho has never considered whether lack of probable cause is a requirement to enforce a no-contest provision." The court declined to consider whether the petitioner had probable cause to bring his petition in probate court at this stage, noting that, on remand, "if [the petitioner was] provided records that allow[ed] him to determine whether he received his full share of the Survivor's Trust, and, within a reasonable time, [did] not withdraw his Arizona petition, the trial court [could] take up the issue of whether [he] ha[d] probable cause to pursue th[at] action."

Mr. Silkenat argues that the Constitutional provision of impeachment should be used sparingly, but that the provision is important to America’s civic health: “The drafters of the U.S. Constitution believed an officeholder’s tyrannical conduct could so endanger the nation that addressing it could not await the next election. This concept had merit then; it still does.”

MDLs Go Mainstream: Mass Torts Today

On this episode, moderator Elizabeth Chamblee Burch of University of Georgia School of Law is joined by John H. Beisner of Skadden, Abbe R. Gluck of Yale Law School, and Shanin Specter of Kline and Specter.

When complex issues affect large numbers of people, MDLs are often seen as the most efficient way to consolidate and manage those cases. However, MDL cases are not only procedurally complex, but also much of what happens during a case is nuanced and known only to MDL practitioners.

The panel explores the procedural complexity of MDLs and discusses if and how the system should be reformed.

This program will also be available for CLE credit through ALI-CLE.org in January 2021.
